

#17 Three Heads are Better than One

Illustrated by Daniel Bickart

A family of ducks in a pond were quacking so loudly, one could hardly hear oneself think. The father duck demanded in boisterous tones, that he knew just the right place to go for the family's next meal. The mother duck disagreed, with loud quacking objections. "I will not move," she vowed, "for you are seldom right!" This standoff raged for some time. While the father advanced well thought out, yet bull-headed proposals, the mother vehemently exercised her will to oppose his pitches. Suddenly their son offered, in a quiet, yet heart-felt tone, "Mom and Dad, while you argued, I noticed some fine grass, leaves, and weeds on the shore. Perhaps we should get them." And so, the family took a break to have a fine dinner, before their next argument.
