

#107 Beeing

Two bees were having a disagreement. They had differing opinions as to the fate of the humans. After all, the bees had long awaited the birth of humankind, and were now watching it grow up. The she-bee had confidence in them. She saw them as teenagers going through a bit of turmoil and unrest, a natural phase of development toward something higher. The he-bee was concerned that they were becoming a self-destructive species, moving toward annihilation. “They are just teens,” taunted the she-bee. “Don’t you remember growing up? When you were very young, you could still see the spiritual beings and you felt taken care of. The whole world was wonderful. Then, you hit the teenage phase and forgot everything you knew. You lost your senses, literally. You could not see or hear spiritual advice and you started thinking on your own.” “Yes, yes,” joined in the he-bee, “but the problem is that, as we lost our childhood, instead of valuing our past wisdom, we thought we knew everything. We thought children knew nothing, and we thought adults knew less!” The she-bee argued, “And for the bees, these stages were ages ago, and we did alright, didn’t we? Now, we know that we had to go through those stages in order to become what we are today. After all, by now we have regained our childhood abilities and put them together with the ability to think on our own, haven't we? I'm sure humankind can do this, too!" "I hope you are right," replied the he-bee. "If only the humans could wake up to the fact that they are BECOMING ... and use the help of the ancestors and beings on the other side. If only they did not act like they already know all about BEING."
